Collection Management

Dealing with Collections Administration

The administrative side of managing collections can be daunting, especially for a volunteer organization or one that has not developed or used good collection management procedures in the past. A lot of terms are used to describe the various processes museums and archives use in order to manage their collection effectively. “Accessioning” an object, for example, simply means that you are recording the addition of a new item to your collection, which is separate from accepting a “donation.” Sometimes this can be a recently acquired object or it can even be an object that was “found in collection.” The latter would refer to any object found in your collection for which you have no information about or even know how it appeared in your collection. Sometimes this can also include old loans that no one has picked up or documented. “Deaccessioning,” which is the removal of an object from a collection, can be a little tricky to navigate since museums, archives, and historical societies are generally thought of as holding objects in public trust. Additionally, taking the time to create a collection management policy for your institution will help guide all present and future collections staff/volunteers as well as establish collection care protocols to ensure the continued preservation of your collections. Tips on how to deal with these processes and create a collection management policy can be found below.
